

Creating Rares Marian Peti: A Portfolio

The beginning,

At first to create this website I thought about the different kinds of websites I could make, and the kind of content I would want to look at as well, so that way I can try to make the website as appealing as possible to any users. I ultimately decided to create a blog about what it was like to create my first few websites and how that experience was, as well as a little blog about who I am and how anyone could contact me. So I began to draw a logo that I would eventually use for my final website. The logo I made is shown on the left.

Preproduction wireframes and pitch board,

After creating a logo I decided to plan out a pitch board explaining the vision I had for the website. The pitch board is figure 2. The next thing I did was create a flow diagram and wireframe, and the images for those are figure 3 and 4 for the wireframe and figure 5 for the flow diagram.

Rares Peti: A Portfolio is a blog of sorts that also doubles as a portfolio from a beginner web designer who just started creating his first websites this year. It gives a background on the student, as well as a description and perspective on all the website's he's created so far.

Personas:

Max is a freshman at MSU who is interested in web design, and wants to know the perspective of another student and what he can expect from a class.

Samantha is a junior at MSU currently studying computer science and is considering transferring to information science, and wants to learn about the program from another student.

Comps:

Finally the flow and comps,

Once the pitch board, and the wireframes were done it was time to write out the flow and create a comp for the 2 pages I ended up making for the final website. Figure 5 displays the flow, and figures 6 and 7 are the comps that I made.
